WESTMINSTER ABBEY

THE stately pile of Westminster Abbey is the ceremonial heart of the British Empire. There many of its most illustrious dead are laid to rest, and there its kings are crowned in ancient pageantry.

The first sacred edifice upon the site was built in early Saxon days, probably by King Sebert about A.D. 616. The Danes must have destroyed the church in Alfred's troubled days, for Dunstan rebuilt it. Edward the Confessor's dearest ambition was to leave it as a monument worthy of himself and his Great Overlord. He lived beneath the shadow of its walls, spent fifteen years remodelling it to something of its present magnificence. He consecrated it a few months before he died and was buried within its walls in the year of the Norman Conquest.

William the First, who claimed the throne through Edward, was crowned in his patron's church on Christmas Day, 1066. All his successors except Mary Tudor, Edward V and Edward VIII, have received their crowns there in a ceremony which has been developing in pomp and circumstance through all these centuries.
‘The Crown of England,' writes Major-General Sir George Younghusband, Keeper of the Jewel House in the Tower of London, 'is older than any Crown in Europe and is worn by a sovereign with more ancient lineage than any of the families of the Western World. Set in the Crown and emblems of royalty are jewels which have their origin in the mists of antiquity.'

And Westminster Abbey, dating back to days when half England was still pagan, is a worthy shrine for the sacred ceremony of anointing and crowning the King-Emperor and his Queen.
