Warm, did you say?

You would like a breath of nice, filtered fresh air?

When you are a passenger in a Canadian National Railways' air-conditioned sleeping car, the remedy is in your own hands.

Each room and each lower berth has an individual controlled air inlet which can be adjusted to prevent drafts and at the same time ensure plenty of healthful, filtered air.

That little black gadget between the windows does the trick. A turn in the direction of the arrow opens or closes the vent and directs the stream of air to just where it is required. There is an absence of drafts with their cold-developing propensities. At night the stream of air can be directed upward so that the fresh, filtered air circulates throughout the night without any discomfort or danger of colds to the sleeping occupant.
