Trinidad

Much of the asphalt over which the motorists of North America speed, comes from the famous, self-filling pitch lake at La Brea, Trinidad.

The island, most southerly of the West Indies and the second largest, was given a name by the original Carib Indians that meant "Land of the Humming Bird". It was aptly named for it is an island of great beauty. To its many natural attractions it adds that of being the place where East meets West, there being some 60,000 East Indian inhabitants who live in perfect harmony with the West Indian natives, which seems to suggest that Kipling's much quoted line was founded more on metre than geography.
