There is a startling affinity between Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, and the Highlands of Scotland. The friendly roundness of Cape Breton's hills, the rugged sculpture of the shores, the salmon fishing streams and the long indentations of the sea, recall vividly to mind the contours and the beauty of the older Caledonia. In Cape Breton, too, most of the voices are Scotch, many of them speaking Gaelic and the skirl of the pipes is a common sound among the hills. As typical a bit of Cape Breton as can be found is Ingonish which is pictured on the cover of this menu. It is not far from the Canadian National's line to Sydney, N.S.
