The Chateau St. Louis

IN 1620, on the hill where the Chateau Frontenac now stands, in the city of Quebec, Champlain began to build a tiny fort, which was later called fort St. Louis after Louis the Just, then King of France. Champlain built a larger fort on the same site in 1626. The English took Quebec in 1629, and this fort was the headquarters of Sir David Kirke until 1632, when the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye restored Quebec to the French. In 1633 Champlain again became Governor of New France, living in Fort St. Louis until his death inside its walls in 1635. The next year Montmagny, his successor, rebuilt the fort of stone, and in 1647 the first Chateau St. Louis was erected within the new walls.

One after another, the Governors of New France came to dwell in the little Chateau, and until the English regime began, this was the centre of the official and social life of French America. Laval, Jolliet, Marquette, LaSalle, d'Iberville and a hundred other great figures of those days of romance passed in and out its doors. In the main hall in 1690 the aged but still fiery Frontenac told Phipp's envoy who came with the demand for the surrender of Quebec that the guns of Fort St. Louis would answer his master.

Frontenac commenced to rebuild the fort in 1693 and the Chateau in the following year, adding to it a second story and a wing. This second Chateau St. Louis was completed in 1700, two years after Frontenac's death. Some years later another wing was built, and except for minor repairs, the Chateau remained as it was until the English took permanent possession of Quebec in 1759. Murray repaired it in 1764 and occupied it for the rest of his term as Governor. It was further restored in 1786, and in 1811 a third story was added. Then it became known as the New Chateau to distinguish it from Haldimand Castle, which had been built in 1784 on a site quite close to it. In January, 1834, the Chateau St. Louis was destroyed by fire. Lord Durham levelled its ruins in 1838 and on the edge of the rock built a promenade which was afterwards incorporated in Dufferin Terrace.

In 1892, on the hill where Champlain built his tiny fort two hundred and seventy-two years before, the Canadian Pacific built the Chateau Frontenac in a charming old French style in keeping with the glorious traditions of the site. Today the Chateau Frontenac is many times as large as then, but there still lingers about its lovely rooms and halls the memories of the lords and ladies of the Chateau St. Louis.
