NORTH DAKOTA

North Dakota is a state that nature has richly endowed, laid out in level prairies, free from brush and stones, and ready for the plow. A climate of sunshiny, grain-ripening summers and dry cold winters spell health for the North Dakota farmer and his family and his stock.

Today the state is entering on a new era of settlement and farm development with the trend toward smaller farms and more of them and especially toward diversified farming and more farmers. The great, small grain state of North Dakota is well on its way to become a still greater state of all the grains and of corn and potatoes, hogs and dairy cows.

North Dakota has room for three new farmers for every one she now has.

The farm products of North Dakota have been liberally used by Great Northern chefs. Giant potatoes, the richest milk and cream, bread from the world's finest wheat grown in the Red River Valley of North Dakota, corn, tomatoes, onions and beef, poultry, pork and mutton from the state—all enter into the composition of the appetizing menus served you in this dining car.

The Greater North Dakota Association invites new settlers to share the good fortune and the opportunities of the state. For information on any particular section of the state write
