A TRUE STORY OF THE WEST

The Glory Trail

WASHINGTON'S birthday, February 22, 1862, and bitter cold. Two thousand feet echoed in cadence on the frozen ground as the first Colorado Volunteer Infantry marched from Denver to upset the plan of the Confederate Government to capture the Union's gold supply.

President Lincoln had said: "Colorado and California are the life-blood of our financial credit." President Jefferson Davis believed with the capture of these gold fields the Confederacy could negotiate large foreign loans.

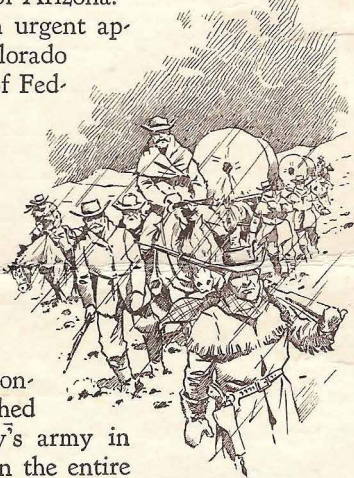

The Confederates, occupying Santa Fe and Albuquerque, had annexed half of New Mexico, calling it the "Territory of Arizona." The Union commander at Fort Craig sent an urgent appeal to Governor William L. Gilpin of Colorado for Volunteer reinforcements to the handful of Federals. The Confederates were advancing. There was no time to lose.

Governor Gilpin at once issued negotiable drafts on the Secretary of the United States Treasury, payable at sight, to a total of $375,000. The citizens contributed all kinds of guns, fowling pieces, old fashioned muskets, heirlooms, a non-descript collection.

By forced marches, among them one continuous march for 67 miles, the regiment reached Fort Union, March 10, and defeated Sibley's army in Apache Canon, the first Confederate defeat in the entire campaign. March 28, 1100 Confederates marched up La Glorietta Pass. Major J. M. Chivington, with a part of the Colorado regiment, climbed the mountain above the Pass and struck the Confederates in the rear, destroying the camp, wagons, draft animals and weapons. The rest of the little Union army, although greatly outnumbered, routed the enemy in a brilliant engagement, "the Gettysburg of the West." The Coloradoans lost 56 killed and 91 wounded; the Confederates, 400 killed, wounded and missing. The West was saved!

Although the Government finally honored the unauthorized drafts, President Lincoln promptly removed Governor Gilpin.

The Burnham Shops of the Denver & Rio Grande Western in Denver overlook the site of Camp Weld where Colorado's first soldiers were quartered and drilled. In 1871, nine years later, the Rio Grande laid its rails over the route of that heroic winter march.
