THRU THE ROCKIES . . . NOT AROUND THEM

A Romance of Glenwood Springs

GLENWOOD SPRINGS, in primitive days, was revered by the Indians. The Great Spirit had endowed its waters with the breath of Life.

Hatred flamed as the Indians watched the pale-faces bathe in the magical pools. Chief Colorow, young, mighty warrior, planned revenge and exterminating slaughter.

On the night appointed for the massacre the Indians watched the pale-faces from an adjoining cliff. In the camp-fire glow the figure of a young maiden caught Colorow's eye. She resembled a tall, white flower. Her hair was like gleaming gold. A plan formed in his mind to rescue her and later make her his bride; for was he not the mighty Chief Colorow of the Utes?

In the days that followed "White Flower" drooped like the Columbine in drought. Her eyes were deep pools that reflected the sky. Colorow grew desperate. He brought her the choicest berries gathered with dew, and made her cakes over the red hot embers. Still he saw the spirit of life leaving her frail body.

In a moment of frantic fear he gathered her in his arms and sped like the wind down the canyon to where the Great Spirit breathed Life in Yampah's vaporous waters.

"White Flower" greeted each morning with laughter. The Great Medicine Spirit had touched her cheeks with roseate hue. Colorow on occasional visits watched her brown hands weave garlands of berries and flowers perfumed with balsam and pine. Shortly now he would make her his bride.

The day had arrived. The sun kissed the heights in a flush of crimson. The valley glowed in purple and amethyst hue. Colorow hastened to where "White Flower" would be waiting.

Big Chief looked around in amazement. Grew frantic in search. He called . . . but only the echoes answered him back. His eyes traveled to dim distances, then close at hand.

Caught on the thorns of a bush was a gauntlet, worn by the pale-face when he rode a horse. Colorow tore it from its fastening, threw it into the abyss below. Overhead an eagle screamed. Colorow timed his arrow. Swift as a bird it flew . . . but for the first time in the young brave's life . . . Big Chief had missed his mark.
