THE LEGEND OF THE RED CLIFFS

Long ago, at the beginning of time, according to the old Navajo legend, the Red Cliffs were not red, but gray. A great stag, seriously wounded in an encounter with a large, evil demon, fled across the gray rocks. The crimson life-blood, flowing from his side, colored the rocks and hills red. Finally, exhausted, he fell dead at the east end of the cliffs. The remaining blood flowed from his wound and congealed forming the black rock formation which we know today as the "lava beds."

The Red Cliffs formation is an outstanding example of weathering and erosion. Few stretches in the world can show such warmth of color along with such massive and tremendous formations of rock. Under the blue New Mexican skies with shadows playing, or shortening or lengthening on the rocky expanses, the red of the cliffs turns from bright to dark, from scarlet to magenta, from blood-red to pink almost before your eyes as your Santa Fe train crosses the Navajolands of western New Mexico.
