Visitors to Los Angeles should plan to take at least one leisurely stroll through Olvera Street, a brick-paved lane, not far from the Los Angeles City Hall and the Union Passenger Terminal, running from Marchessault Street north to Macy Street. Here, amid the bustle of a thriving metropolis, life goes on much the same as it does in a sleepy bazaar south of the border.

The work of restoring this particular bit of present-day Los Angeles to the manner of an old Mexican street was completed and the street dedicated in 1930. Seventy shops of various kinds line either side and in the center are stalls and booths with tempting souvenir articles for sale. Baskets, beadwork, lacework, sombreros, Mexican delicacies and hundreds of other articles line the shelves and counters. Brilliantly colored gourds and other dried fruits and vegetables hang from the canopies. Gay caballeros strum guitars in front of the colorful cafes, and a carnival atmosphere prevails. Several shops feature the manufacture of sweet-scented candles, and native candlemakers may be seen at work practicing the art that has been handed down from generation to generation. A carved wooden cross at the entrance commemorates the founding of the pueblo of Los Angeles in 1781.

Quaint Olvera Street, in downtown Los Angeles, is a colorful and charming bit of Old Mexico right in the heart of the city.
