

A Short 100 Years Ago

The West was a wilderness of prairie, mountains, and plains . . . a vast hunting ground of the Indians. Transportation was by horse, by foot, or by stagecoach.

The adventurous ones came first . . . the miners and the trappers, followed by the pioneers with their plows and their cattle, pushing the frontier westward, mile by mile.

Then came the railroad . . . gleaming rails over which trains rolled, farther into the raw, new country. Settlers moved in. New towns sprang up. Territories were organized, and soon they became states.

And now after a century of service, a new, contemporary kind of railroad has emerged. Its methods of moving people and products are modern. The emphasis now is on efficient, specialized service and equipment, and in bringing in new industry to keep the West building.

Union Pacific's constant objective is to provide superior transportation service. Competition is keen and only the rugged will survive. Union Pacific welcomes the challenge.
