

"For you a rose in Portland grows" has long been a slogan of Portland, Oregon. And Portland takes its rose bush culture seriously. The International Rose Test Gardens were established in 1917 in the interest of developing and testing the finest roses from all parts of the world. They embrace 3.7 acres and the whole garden area in Washington Park comprises a total of 12 acres, including also the Royal Rosarian Garden, display beds of roses, the Garden Theatre, the Shakespeare Memorial Garden and a garden of azaleas, camellias and rhododendrons.

Washington Park, on the west side of Portland, about one mile from the business center, was acquired by Portland in 1871. It is a wooded area of 102 acres containing the City Zoo and two main city reservoirs. Portland has 2,917 acres of parks and playgrounds. The park properties include two municipal golf links having a total of 302 acres with another in the planning stage. Altogether there are 120 parks, large and small, and their location is such that every section of the city is provided with neighborhood parks facilities.

A sunken rose garden with 9,628 rose bushes is maintained in Peninsula Park in East Portland.

The colorful Rose Festival, held in June each year, turns the city into a fairyland of rose-decked and sweet-scented beauty, attracting throngs of visitors.

One of the outstanding beauty spots of Portland. "The Rose City," is the International Rose Test Gardens in Washington Park.
