

Stanford University, with its 8,800 acres, of which 1,500 is developed university plant, is the largest campus in the world. It is located 33 miles south of San Francisco in the Santa Clara Valley, one mile from the city of Palo Alto.

An enabling act for the institution was granted by the State of California in 1885 and its doors were opened to students in 1891. Now in its 58th year, the University has an enrollment of about 8,000, including 2,000 women.

With high minimum entrance requirements, Stanford is nationally known for the high academic standards of its six professional schools and of the general liberal arts program of its Faculty of Humanities and Sciences. The professional schools are Business, Education, Engineering, Law, Medicine, and Mineral Sciences.

Stanford has achieved eminence in athletics as well as in scholarship. Intercollegiate sports and a broad intramural program give every student opportunity for athletic participation.

The University is currently in one of its greatest periods of development. Two new residential halls are being constructed; almost a million dollars is being put into the building of new Law School quarters, and a large new laboratory is being put up to house an electron linear accelerator, which, when completed will be the largest atom smasher in the world.

It is all part of the picture of "a university of high degree," the fulfillment of the aim of the founders, Governor Leland Stanford and his wife, Jane Lathrop Stanford.

Red-tile roofs, cool brown sandstone, and vistas through ivy-fringed arches typify the beauty of Stanford University's Campus.
