

The University of Denver, for nearly 87 years the dominant institution in the Rocky Mountain region, established a tradition in the West even before Colorado became a state and before the rails of the Union Pacific moved westward to make Denver the "Queen City of Mountains and Plains."

John Evans, first territorial governor who had come west after helping to establish Northwestern University, was responsible for founding the University of Denver in 1864. It was John Evans, credited with much of the cultural and industrial development of the region, who helped bring the Union Pacific to Denver.

And it was the huge university bell which pealed loudest on that day in 1870 when the first UP train arrived in Mile-High Denver.

Today the University of Denver continues to lead the growth and cultural development of the West, annually serving 18,000 students in its 28 colleges, schools, research bureaus and civic activities. Two huge campuses occupy key locations, one adjacent to Denver's famed Civic Center, the other in Southeast Denver commanding a spectacular vista of the Rockies.

There is a special view of the 14,260-foot mountain named for its founder, Mount Evans, atop which the University conducts important studies into the secrets of cosmic rays.

Students come from all states and U. S. possessions and 30 foreign countries to take full advantage of the knowledge and training offered by one of the outstanding privately-endowed institutions of the nation. They also enjoy low-cost, luxury housing and the unmatched recreational opportunities offered in Denver's vast mountain playgrounds where skiing, hunting, fishing, mountain-climbing, year-around skating and swimming abound within a few minutes from either campus.
