

"For you a rose in Portland grows" has long been a slogan of Portland, Oregon. And, to make sure that they will always offer nothing but the finest blooms for the admiration of visitors, Portland takes its rose bush culture seriously. The International Rose Test Gardens were established in 1917 in the interest of developing and testing the finest roses from all parts of the world. They are, perhaps, the most famous of six test gardens of this kind maintained in different areas in the United States. The Rose Test Gardens embrace two acres and the whole garden area in Washington Park comprises a total of twelve acres, including also the Royal Rosarian Garden, display beds of roses, the Garden Theatre, the Shakespeare Memorial Garden and a garden of Azaleas, Camellias and Rhododendrons.

Washington Park, on the west side of Portland, about one mile from the business center, was acquired by Portland in 1871. It is a wooded area of 100 acres containing the City Zoo and two main city reservoirs. Portland has 2,260 acres of parks and playgrounds with an additional 2,500 acres soon to be developed. The park properties include three municipal golf links having a total of 514 acres. Altogether there are 101 parks, large and small, and their location is such that every section of the City is provided with neighborhood parks facilities.

In addition to the International Rose Test Gardens, there is a sunken rose garden with 14,000 rose bushes maintained in Peninsula Park in East Portland.

The colorful Rose Festival, held in June each year, turns the city into a fairyland of rose-decked and sweet-scented beauty, drawing throngs of visitors.

One of the outstanding beauty spots of Portland, "The Rose City", is the International Rose Test Gardens in Washington Park.
