Colorado—The Perfect Vacationland

First of all, there are the mountains. There's a fascination, an attraction about them which appeals to some innate sensibility in the human being and produces an urge to go where the mountains are. People who have never seen the mountains feel this urge. People who do go to the mountains fall under the magic spell of the Rockies and never get over it and don't want to. They go back there time after time and thrill to it.

Second, Colorado has a wonderful summer climate. The air is thin and doesn't hold either moisture or heat, so that days are bright with sunshine but never humid or oppressive, while nights are delightfully cool and almost always invite the rough friendliness of a blanket.

Such an environment, such a contrast brings an instant change. The mental quickening, the something inexplicable, buoyant, comes with the first breath of mountain air, the first sweep of the eye over the north and south far-reaching Rampart Range. Colorado ozone works fast. The two-weeks vacationer, the worked-out worker, gets more variety, more tonical punch in Colorado at the least comparative cost than in any summer region within the scope of his vacation possibilities.

A third and especially potent factor in Colorado's popularity as a vacationland is that it holds such a diversity of attractions that it suits EVERYBODY. The active individual who wishes to follow the skyland trail up to the highest heights has only to choose his trail. They lead out in every direction from wherever you happen to be—hiking trips or horseback trips of long or short duration to places where a mountain stream plunges over a heroic precipice to fall hundreds of feet below in a cloud of iridescent spray, to glaciers ages old, to the brink of yawning canyons, or to the very summit of a grand old peak for a view of the surrounding mountain world.

Woodland paths penetrate the green forest to end at peaceful little mountain lakes, clear beautiful gems, some mirroring the pines, others reflecting the granite face of an awe-inspiring precipice which rises a sheer half mile straight up from the shore.

In Colorado are many places of accommodation and these too, help explain why it suits everybody. You can pitch a tent beside a sparkling stream and cook your meals over a campfire. You can rent a cottage or log cabin and either prepare your own meals or have them in a little community dining hall. There are rustic inns at the shore of lovely lakes, Alpine lodges—lots of them—up in the mountains, and many fine, big hotels which are equal in every way to the best type of metropolitan hostelry.

You can go fishing or play tennis or golf, hike or ride horseback, swim or go motor-ing, recreate and rest in any old way which pleases you. A place couldn't be made to order that would suit you more perfectly.
