THE CHUCK WAGON

Charles Goodnight constructed what was probably the first chuck wagon. He bought the gear of a Government wagon and had it rebuilt with the toughest wood he knew — Osage Orange. The wooden axles were replaced with iron and for lubrication a can of tallow replaced the usual Army tar bucket.

The chuck wagon was a commissary on wheels, equipped with a box at the rear for storing tin dishes, a Dutch oven, a frying pan, kettle and coffee pot. The standard staples also had their exact places; green-berry coffee, salt pork, corn meal, flour and beans. A folding leg was usually attached to the chuck box lid, so that it formed a table when lowered. The main body of the wagon was packed with bedrolls, slickers, and extra clothing. Fastened at the front was a water barrel.

The first day of the roundup, the men would be up before dawn to eat their breakfasts early at the chuck wagon. After supper, while the cook was washing the pots and pans, the cowboys liked to assemble around the fire for some singing. If they were lucky, a fiddler would be among them. They sang rollicking songs, sad songs, etc., but usually ended with a sacred hymn. Soon afterward, all except the night-herders would be in their bedrolls.
