THE INDIAN MAYOR.

By Chief Buffalo Child Long Lance.

Chief Buffalo Child Long Lance, the author, is a full-blooded Indian, a chief of the Blood tribe of Alberta. He is a graduate of Carlisle, where he gained a reputation in university sorts. He was appointed to West Point in 1915, but relinquished this appointment in 1916 to go overseas with the Canadian forces. Entering the field as a private, he served with distinction, was twice wounded and returned at the end of the war with the rank of captain. He is at present engaged in writing a history of the Indians of the Canadian plains, British Columbia and the North Country.

THE photograph on the reverse side of this menu shows Chief Running Rabbit and Drunken Chief watering their horses on the historic Sun Dance flats along the Bow River in Southern Alberta. Once a year the Blackfeet journey to this spot, pitch their camp of two hundred painted tepees and, for two weeks, carry on the ancient rites of the famous Sun Dance. The big circular camp is situated a half-mile from this watering hole, just back of the rise of prairieland, and about eight miles south of Gleichen.

Chief Running Rabbit, standing on the river bank, is perhaps the only Indian on the continent who has had the distinction of being mayor of a city. During the Calgary Stampede of July, 1923, the Indian tribes of the Alberta plains were brought together for the first time since the Peace Treaty of 1877, when they were purposely scattered on widely separated reserves to insure peace and safety to the incoming settlers. While thus gathered in the city which had grown up on what had been their fighting grounds a few years back, the Indians decided to play a joke on the white man. An old-time war council was held among the chiefs of the various tribes: Chiefs Running Rabbit, Weasel Calf—a signer of the Treaty of '77—Spring Chief, Calf Bull, Heavy Shield, Back Fat, Water Chief and Calf Child of the Blackfeet; White Head, Killing Moose and Walking Buffalo of the Stonys; Big Plume of the Sarcees and Buffalo Child Long Lance of the Bloods. They decided to recover their hunting-grounds; to take the city of Calgary away from the white man.

Painted and feathered and mounted on their war ponies, they charged down the streets, captured the city hall, bound Mayor Webster to a horse and took him to the center of the city, where they ended their joke by making him an honorary chief of the Blackfoot tribe. Mayor Webster reciprocated by making Chief Running Rabbit full mayor of Calgary for one month.

Running Rabbit, who is the head-chief of the Blackfoot tribe, is one of the most famous warriors left among the Indians of the Canadian West. In a big Indian massacre forty miles north of Saskatoon he saved the entire tribes of Blackfeet, Bloods, Sarcees and Piegans from practical annihilation. The Blackfeet and their allies were advancing up the Saskatchewan River in search of their enemies, the allied Crees, Saulteaux and Assiniboines, whom they knew to be camping somewhere along that stream.

On the night preceding the massacre, Running Rabbit had a "Medicine Dream," in which he foresaw overwhelming defeat for his tribe and their allies. When he related this dream to the chief and advised him to turn back, the chief told him and his followers that anyone who chose to go back, "might as well go home and put on his wife's dress." Running Rabbit said: "I am not married, but I will go home and put on a woman's dress."

The chief continued his search with an advance party of 300 scouts, but the majority of the four tribes, having great faith in the strength of Running Rabbit's "Medicine," had turned back with him.

The next day it was learned that the chief and his men had been trapped by an ambush consisting of the whole force of the three enemy tribes, and practically wiped out. From that time on Running Rabbit's fame as a Medicine Man increased until finally he became a great chief whose exploits are still talked of daily among the Plains Tribes.

In a latter conflict with the Crees, Running Rabbit had his head split open from between the eyes to the crown of his head, and he received a bullet through the chest and another which smashed his right thigh, but he recovered and fought many subsequent battles before the Treaty of '77 was signed.

The warrior who so badly mutilated Running Rabbit was a brave named Playing-With-Arrows, who still lives in the Touchwood Agency of Saskatchewan. He told me that he met Running Rabbit on the train, returning from the Winnipeg Stampede in 1913, and he said to him: "I suppose we will have to be friends now; we can't fight anymore." Running Rabbit replied: "I suppose so."

Running Rabbit wears seven medals in this photograph, including one from Queen Victoria, one from the royal family of Japan and one from President U. S. Grant.
