The Hotel Saskatchewan, Regina

A LONG Pile o' Bones Creek fifty years ago the Royal North West Mounted Police rode for days in constant sight of vast herds of Buffalo. The accumulated remains of generations of these animals gave the creek, and the settlement upon its banks, their picturesque but not euphonious name.

A few years later the double-barrelled rifle, together with the demand for buffalo robes for the sleighs of the Easterners, began to effect the extermination of the ancient Lords of the Prairie. Within a generation their roving millions were reduced to a few specimens in parks and zoological gardens. Even their Pile o' Bones disappeared from the geography books. The Creek is now Wascana; the city is Regina, proud capital of the prosperous Province of Saskatchewan.

In 1882 the capital of what was then the North-West Territories was moved from Battleford to Regina. In 1883 the headquarters of the R.N.W.M.P. followed it. In 1905, when the more settled parts of the Territories were erected into the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, Regina became the seat of government of the latter.

Here, in one of the great cities of the Canadian West, where once the buffalo pawed the ground in their last stand against man's destructiveness, the Canadian Pacific has erected a great modern hotel in which the visitor will find the same standards of luxury and service as he is accustomed to in the oldest cities of the East.
